TO

GEORGE MACAULAY TREVELYAN

Where he from whom you take your name, whose mantle upon you descends,— where he whose heritage of fame
my name and thought their meaning lends, were rivals in the friendly game ;—
where later our two fathers came,
met, and were friends ;—
where we, in turn, grew glad to meet, the trinity of friends complete :— For Trinity, whose height first brought the breadth of vision to our thought ;
whose love of freedom bade us look beyond the hedge-row and the book ;
who gave, the most three years could give,
the wish to know, the strength to live,
and crowned her gift with blessings three,
good work, good friends, good liberty ;—
for Trinity, will you, the best she brought, take tribute for the rest ;—
one breath from that strong wind of truth that filled our lungs in comrade youth.
