FOREWORD

DEAR MR. SWIRE:

When, first, I learned that it was in your mind to make a bibliography of my books I went to the shelves on which they had been gathered and gazed at them again with an awakened and considerable interest. Only yesterday, a few moments ago, it seemed, there had been but one — The Lay Anthony; and now there were ten — or was it eleven? — that many, and more to be collected, in eight years. There, undoubtedly they were, in their various editions; and I was amazed. I hadn't quite realized that so much of what I was went that way . . . fixed, perhaps, for a while short or long, but gone. I had not realized that the secret treachery of time had prevailed against me to such an extent. Eight years, it was true, were not many, but they had been taken — a large bite — out of the rosiest cheek of the apple. It was still my profound conviction, it is as I write, that better was to come; that what I had done, written, was hardly more than introductory. But, together with this, I had a faint uneasy consciousness that I was being merely blinded by the trustfulness and self deception which, perhaps, alone made life endurable. Anyhow, there they were, the ten, or eleven, in paper and cloth and boards — the months, the years, the toil, the failures and the successes.
