PREFACE.

EVERY autumn at the first approach of frost, there sets in a general migration, like that of the swallows, from the colder lands of Northern and Central Europe to the sunny shores of the Mediterranean. Thousands of tourists—some prompted by pleasure, others seeking in the genial climate of Southern France restoration to health, or fleeing before the winter of their own colder latitudes—hurry southwards, to bask in the sunshine of the Riviera, to gather sweet flowers and delicious fruit in mid-winter, to bathe in the ultramarine waters of the Mediterranean; in short, to enjoy to the full the thousand charms and attractions of an earthly paradise.

Then it is that villages which during the summer have languished in dreamy torpor, deserted, hot and dusty, start into sudden life and activity. Active preparations are made for the coming harvest, and in a few weeks the patois of the province is lost amid the babel of civilised tongues.

The railway companies controlling the routes to these happy shores have profited largely by their popularity, and have kept pace with the constantly increasing demand for rapid and comfortable transport.

Express trains now run, during the season, from Paris to Cannes in twenty hours, to Nice in twenty-one hours, to Monaco or Mentone in twenty-two hours, and to Bordighera or San Remo in twenty-four hours. Not only do the chief express trains contain sleeping cars, coupé-lits, or fauteuillits, but certain trains are entirely composed of these luxurious adjuncts to comfort in travelling.

A cheap, comprehensive, and accurate Handbook to the numerous health resorts of the Riviera thus becomes a public necessity, and the rapid absorption of the first edition of this handbook has clearly justified its issue. Descriptions of the localities exist, it is true, in many Guide Books to France and Italy, but the traveller who limits his tour to the Mediterranean coast does not care for long descriptions of Italian and French cities which he does not intend to visit.

This little work consequently contains :—

I. General information useful to all travellers to the South of France.

II. A concise description of all the principal towns on the Mediterranean between Marseilles and Leghorn.

III. Extracts from a series of articles upon the Riviera, specially relating to its flora and fauna.
