THOSE apparent discrepancies between religious faith and the principle upon which the character is formed, that impeded one of the individuals whose exertions are recorded in the following pages, having, through subsequent inquiry, been reconciled, a further issue of the work cannot be allowed without this prefatory declaration, and a supplement explanatory of the considerations by which his confidence has been restored. As the objections advanced were met by arguments derived from the most able polemical writers in theology, it was thought by some that the circulation of the work could not fail to be useful, even unaccompanied by the Supplement; for truth, and more especially the truths of religion, can never suffer from the candid avowal of doubts, or even from opposition, which, on the contrary, often proves most beneficial by stimulating thought and closer examination.
