THIS book has been prepared for the use of classes in grammar and intermediate schools. It is made to conform to the principles adopted in the Analytical Series. These principles, it is thought, have successfully borne the test of actual use in the recitation-room, and they are recommended to educators with renewed confidence.

One of these principles is, that the foundation of all efforts in reading should be a thorough appreciation of the thoughts and emotions expressed in what is read. Vocal expression must take its character from the meaning it is to convey.

But the necessity for vocal drill and voice-culture is fully recognized. Every book in the series aims to present some of the best examples for such drill.

The recent improvement in the character of literature for the young, has enabled the compiler to make selections for this book, unequalled, it is believed, by those of any similar book now before the public, both in their general merits as literary productions, and in their adaptedness to the purpose of teaching reading. Among the selections, however, are many old pieces of sterling merit.

Appended to many of the selections will be found suggestions and questions intended to assist in developing the thought. Teachers are earnestly recommended to pursue a similar or more thorough course with others.

The "Phonic Analysis" is believed to be more than usually thorough, exhaustive, and reliable. Like that for the Fifth and Sixth Readers, it was prepared by Professor Thomas Metcalf, of the Illinois Normal University.

The "Directions and Explanations" contain an exposition of elocutionary principles believed to be fully adequate to the needs of those who are to use the book. They are expressed in language sufficiently simple.

The compiler acknowledges himself under obligations to many writers and publishing firms for permission to use material of theirs as selections for reading. Among these it is proper to mention Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, of Boston, publishers of "Our Young Folks," and Alfred L. Sewell, of Chicago, publisher of "The Little Corporal."
