SOPHOMORE YEAR.

THE first term of the Sophomore year began Sept. 1, 1864, with one hundred and nine members in the Class, eleven of them being "Fresh Sophs." Of these, five had composed the advanced class at Exeter.

With the beginning of the year, Gray's Hall, which had been in the process of building for some time, was opened for students, and seventeen members of the Class took rooms there.

The term had no sooner begun — in fact, the term had not yet begun — when the most enterprising members of the Class turned their attention towards those who had stepped into the places so lately occupied by themselves; in other words, hazing began. To attempt to give any account of the methods pursued and the jokes played would be useless, not to say impossible, at this late day. Suffice it to say, our Class was not behindhand in making this display of itself, and earned a reputation which, at the time, was far from favorable to its members.

The most famous case on record, that of applying kerosene oil to the hair of some Freshmen, excited the indignation of the good people of Massachusetts to a considerable extent; but as fire was not applied to this original kind of a wash, the consequences were far less disastrous to the parties anointed than to their assailants, who were subsequently suspended for eighteen months and dropped. The latter part of their sentence was afterwards removed. One of the results of this punishment was, that soon after about four hundred panes of glass were broken in one night. A petition for the restoration of these men gave rise to a proposition from the Faculty to do so, on condition that there was absolutely no more hazing during the year.

"Bloody Monday night," so called because a Faculty meeting leaves the students for the first time without protectors and police, was celebrated by sending up the spirit of the football, the exercises being conducted with prayer, and attended by the whole Sophomore Class. The Faculty having forbidden the football
