I. OF UNITY IN THE FORMS OF ORGANIC NATURE	8
--	---

I.

OF UNITY IN THE ORGANS OF LIVING BODIES	9
1. In the plant	9
2. In the animal	23

II.

OF UNITY IN THE ENTIRE ORGANISM	31
1. In the plant	31
2. In the animal	34

III.

OF UNITY IN PLANT AND ANIMAL	45
1. General considerations in favour of this doctrine	46
2. Special arguments in demonstration of it	53
Of the primary and fundamental hindrance to the discovery of unity in organic nature—namely, the archetypal law of the vertebra, and of the partial removal of this difficulty	53

1.
	Of unity in the nervous, vascular, osseous, and other systems, of which the animal frame is constituted	PAGE 65
2.
	Of unity in the vertebral and anellose zones	71
3.
	Of unity in the archetypal law of the plant and animal	75
II.	OF UNITY IN THE FORMS OF ORGANIC AND INORGANIC NATURE	94
	1. In relation to outward shape	95
	2. In relation to structure	99
	3. In relation to function	101

CHAPTER II.

OF UNITY IN FORCE.

I.	OF UNITY IN THE FORCE ASSOCIATED WITH UNORGANIZED SUBSTANCES	107
	Of the arguments by which Mr. Grove demonstrates correlation and reciprocal dependence in heat, light, electricity, magnetism, chemical affinity and motion—namely, in those agencies which constitute the force of inorganic matter	107
	Of a more intimate union than correlation in these agencies	117
II.	OF UNITY IN THE FORCE OF ORGANIC AND INORGANIC NATURE	122

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
1.
Of the presence in organic bodies of the force which is found in unorganized substances	123
2.
Of unity in the phenomena of vital force	124
1. Of the vital force in man	124
Of the necessity to employ metaphysical reasonings in order to arrive at a knowledge of this force; and of the impossibility to arrive at this knowledge if the present state of man be assumed as a perfect standard of judgment	124
Of the necessity of Revelation to determine the true physical condition of man	124
Of the possibility to solve in part the problem of life when creation is interpreted by Revelation	133
Of the relation between the vitality of man and the brute, both in bodily and mental phenomena	137
Of absolute unity in the vital essence	139
2. Of unity in the twofold force of living bodies— namely, in the principle of life, and in the force associated with the matter of these bodies—as mere matter	140
Of correlation, or reciprocal dependence in these forces	140
Of unity in these forces	141
Of the final proofs of unity, and the possibility of showing, not only that all physical and vital forces will merge into one, but also, that the union will extend from form to force, and include matter and spirit	142
