PEERAGES.

THE influence of the Aristocracy in England has always been predominant; and whether the characters of the individuals who constitute it have at some periods been great and glorious, in others disgraceful and pusillanimous, the Memorials of Members forming so prominent a part of the Constitution can never be regarded with indifference. If, indeed, it be true, that the descent of an individual generally presents an important feature in his history, the necessity of collecting and preserving genealogical details is obvious. Of their value and importance most persons are fully sensible; al-
