DECEMBER MEETING, 1894.

THE stated meeting was held on Thursday, the 13th instant, at three o'clock, P. M. ; the President, Dr. GEORGE E. ELLIS, in the chair. There was an unusually large attendance of members, as it was understood that the time would be specially devoted to tributes to the memory of the late Hon. ROBERT C. WINTHROP, who had died since the preceding meeting, in his eighty-sixth year.¹

After the reading of the record of the last meeting, the PRESIDENT said that, in accordance with a vote of the Council, the regular order of business would be laid aside, and that there would be no communications of the usual character. At the close of the meeting some votes which it would be necessary to pass at the present time would be offered by the Treasurer. He then said : —

We have with us here to-day the remembrance only of an associate so long identified with these rooms, and so valued and honored by us as one who brought to the Presidency of this Society distinctions won in the highest ranges of public service. There are many places, scenes, and fellowships in which the career and qualities of Mr. Winthrop will be reviewed and commemorated. His life, lengthened through the fullest span of years till its springs were exhausted, gave him space for the exercise of his rich endowments, attainments, and accomplishments in many and varied fields of elevated distinction. His full career was divided, in nearly equal terms of years, into three widely different forms of service and experience. In very early manhood he came into public life under the most favoring influences of opportunity and popularity. With a fine personality, gifted in presence and in speech, highly cultivated in scholarship, literary and classical, with pre-eminence in family and social position, he was courted and honored by rapid advancement, in civil, military, and political offices, in his native State. He justified the partiality shown to him by his full ability to meet all expectations, by his elevation of character, his talents, aptitudes, and eloquence, on many exacting occasions.

The second strongly marked period of his career was that which found him in honored positions in our national legislature, in the convulsions and distractions of the most perilous struggle in the life of our country, a storm in which two seas met. It was a time and an occasion of trial, with glooms and catastrophes, through which no earnest and prominent responsible actor passed unscathed by party heats, acrimony, and challenging of principle or courage. Mr. Winthrop's temperament and his instructed judgment prompted him to stand for conciliation and peace to the utmost edge of the alternative presented to our country. The alternative being decided, a fervid and steadfast patriotism guided his course, without passion or bitterness, till the issue closed. Privileged are those among us who have lived only after that conflict. For those of us who passed through it the best we can now do is no longer to revive or agitate those strifes, but to reserve them for quiet hours of reading and thought. It was among the privileges of his lengthened life that Mr. Winthrop survived not only all his leading contemporaries, but also the most embittered memories, misjudgments, and alienations arising from them. Such of them as concerned himself were kindly reviewed and conciliated. In the serenity and calm of advancing years, the memory of them came to him only with gentle speech and judgments of charity. Politics exempted him from choosing place or responsibility in after contentions of parties.

The third period of Mr. Winthrop's life was that in which he was best known to most of you here. It has been, in the main, one of retired dignity, — the statesman's, the scholar's, the honored citizen's years of retrospect and repose. Yet it has been by no means an idle term, enriched as it was by labors of the mind and pen. Our last great bereavement as a Society took from us that loved and gifted man to whom all bright occasions made their appeal for a Poem. To Mr. Winthrop like appeals were made for Prose. Besides the multiplied occasions on which, with learning, grace, and felicitous speech, he met the constant course of time in events, with successive actors, it was his privilege to rehearse and glorify the four most signal incidents in our national history, — the Plymouth pilgrimage, the Centennial of Independence, the triumph at Yorktown, and the dedication of the Washington Monument. More than one hundred and fifty of our own countrymen, of various distinctions, besides many of eminence abroad, have received from his pen biographical or memorial tributes. From the four published volumes of his orations, addresses, and speeches, might be culled a well-nigh continuous history, narration, or relation of the chief incidents, local and national, in our annals, interspersed with the agency and influence of leading characters. In the wide and comprehensive range of benevolent and philanthropic methods which are in action so vigorously in our own privileged community, his years of retirement were most assiduously engaged. His name and his contributions are mentioned in connection with each and all of them, either as the official head in their management or as a generous patron. Our best organized charitable institution and method, Bible and other religious societies, the Children's Hospital and other noble objects, engaged his devotion and oversight. Chief among them was one most dear to him.
