TABLE OF CONTENTS.

PREFACE.	PAGE
The British Electors' suspicion of theory is mistaken because, (1) historically, grand political epochs coincide with grand religious and philosophical epochs,	xi
and (2) political practice and theory are as a matter of fact inseparable	xii
This is particularly the case when politics become constructive	xiii
as they are to-day.	xiii
For constructive political work the organic conception of society is the most fruitful. ...	xvi
As the Socialist alone considers not only the individual but the social unit in his work, he must have a clear idea of what the nature of the unit is.	xviii
This necessitates a re-statement of the Socialist conception of historical progress.	xix
CHAPTER I—THE PROBLEM.
The Problem is Poverty, which is not merely physical but mental and moral.	1
Outward improvement may proceed along with vital decay.	2
The question does not merely affect the workman, but the capitalist	4
and the whole of society	6
Individuality is rare under modern conditions ...	7
The reason is that each function in society is self-centred and competitive;	8
hence, co-ordination is the task of the Twentieth Century.	9
