PREFACE

The following lectures in the Dodge Course at Yale University upon the Responsibilities of Citizenship deal chiefly with a certain aspect of the general subject which appears to me at the present time to possess great importance. With a digression here and there upon some other branch of the central theme established by the donor for the course, what I have said relates principally to the encroachments of the law upon the liberty of the individual and the necessity of maintaining the largest attainable measure of freedom. It seems to me that the substance of my lectures may be fairly well indicated by the title I have adopted, "The Liberty of Citizenship."
