PREFACE

ABOUT two years after the publication of the book, "The Children's Educational Theatre" (1911) numerous letters from teachers and parents came to me and still continue to come in large numbers, asking me to write another book which shall give some suggestions concerning the methods employed in my work of developing in children and adolescents the instinct to characterize or to enact parts in games and plays which lie outside of their restricted environment.

Since the inception of The Children's Educational Theatre fifteen years ago, the idea that drama might be used as a potent educational force in connection with school, church and settlement work, has grown by leaps and bounds. There is scarcely a school in this country which does not prepare a play or a pageant for its commencement or a settlement which does not offer some dramatic entertainment at Christmas tide and other holiday seasons. The churches have been slower than the schools and settlements to re-attach themselves to the educative power of drama, a power they employed with fine and lasting results centuries ago; but the churches now are beginning to regain their temporarily lost inheritance and all educators throughout the United States are keenly alive to the importance of training the dramatic instinct of childhood and youth.

I think we may all agree that the cause of drama as an embroidery on the robe of education has been won. School superintendents, principals, teachers and parents recognize the overwhelming interest which children evince in the plays which they prepare for seasonal periods.

What is not generally recognized is the fact that this tremendous interest on the part of children and young people in this method of learning should be used as the very foundation of the robe and not as its mere external embroidery. This matter of drama in the schools
