HINTS
ON MATRIMONY.

BY A PRACTICAL MAN.

"If men could be contented to be what they are, there were no fear in marriage."

All's Well that End's Well.

London:

KERBY & ENDEAN, 44^o OXFORD STREET.

1882.

HINT II.

WHEN the breaking off is settled upon, it should be done at once. And every consideration should be shown by their friends to the disappointed couple.

“Many have come to a port after a storm.”

HINT III.

AFTER this engagement has been broken off, no intimate association should be permitted but with companions that are eligible.

"We hate delay: yet it makes us wise."

HINT IV.

THE up-springing of true affection will then probably arise; but where a match is really desirable and tastes are similar, a very pleasant life may generally be looked for. Commencing, perhaps, without much love, but with esteem gradually ripening into reliable and true affection.

“Trusting often makes fidelity.”
