SCOTTISH NATIONAL PERIODICAL.

TO THE PUBLIC.

It has been often remarked, that Scotamen are peculiarly distinguished for nationality, and that every thing in the slightest degree connected with the honour of their native land, has for them an interest, which others, not imbued with the same intense feeling of amor patriæ, are sometimes inclined to look upon as excessive. It is rather strange, that, while this is confessedly the case, Scotland should yet be without any Periodical dedicated to the delineation of those peculiarities which distinguish her from the other nations of the world, and which constitute so great a part of that which men recognize under the name of country. To supply this desideratum, THE SCOTS WEEKLY MAGAZINE was commenced; the Conductors having resolved to devote its pages, as far as possible, to the elucidation of every thing connected with the Manners, Customs, Traditions, History, and Literature of Scotland. The extensive circulation with which they have been honoured, shews that "the ancient spirit is not dead;" and that though the Sceptre has departed from Caledonia, her sons are yet keenly alive to every thing which vindicates her national honour, and illustrates the doings of other days. The Conductors cannot conceal from themselves, however, that their endeavours were considerably impeded by the late shape of the Publication, as the variety of the articles required in every Number necessarily abridged the length of many, much to the injury of the subject discussed, while several articles of a more interesting nature than any which have yet appeared, were from the same cause altogether excluded. The inconvenience of this was more felt when the Conductors had been favoured with the co-operation of two Literary Gentlemen, whose researches for several years into the Ancient Manners, Customs, and Superstitions of Scotland, have been of the most recondite and laborious nature, and who have now completed a work destined to do for Scotland what

Bourne, Brand, Douce, Grose, Hone, and Ellis, have so worthily accomplished for the sister kingdom. These weighty considerations have now induced the Conductors to change the mode of publication into that of Monthly Parts;—a course which they the more readily adopt, because the great majority of the Subscribers to the Work have already signified their preference of these to the late Weekly Numbers.—To the patronage of all interested in the national objects which have been alluded to, they recommend it. No research or labour will be spared to make it worthy of the public support; and from the unlimited resources to which the Conductors have ready access, they may be forgiven for hoping, that though the CHEAPEST Magazine in Scotland, it will not be found inferior to similar works of higher price and loftier pretensions.
