Prefactory Word

VISION is a popular term often misapplied and much abused. Frequently it has but one dimension—length. It is like a telescope extending sight to remote stars, but shutting out all celestial bodies not in its visual angle; or a search-light tunnelling thick darkness, and revealing only objects in a narrow radius of its spotlight. A reformer or missionary may so see, through a vista of years, actualities without their relationship. Horizon is needed—a vision in all directions,—daylight observation of things related to each other. In horizon the observer is at the centre of his world, limited by a sky-line where roads lead beyond sight.

A statesman has not only vision, but horizon. He sees his country in commercial, religious, diplomatic and international relations. He recognizes with-
