PREFACE.

SOME apology for introducing these "Scraps" to the public may perhaps be deemed necessary.

The author is perfectly aware that any one inclined to criticise may here find ample scope for the exercise of his talents. There are, no doubt, many passages, and many words, which a better scholar might have improved or avoided. It may be stated, however, in extenuation of any faults that may appear, that the author's pronunciation of some words is certainly provincial, and widely differing from the standard of WALKER. Moreover, as nearly the whole was composed whilst wandering
