PREFACE.

THE following pages were originally published as two articles in 'Blackwood's Magazine' for the months of February and April of this year.

The favourable manner in which they were received, the advice of some friends, the changes said to be impending in the army, and the interest taken by the public in this question generally, have induced the writer to republish them—with a few additions and corrections—in their present shape.

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER I.

	PAGE
Great expense of modern armies,	1
Why greater in our army than in the Continental ones,	2
Causes of the increased cost of armies,	3
Necessity of a powerful staff and supply organisation,	5
Impatience of financial reformers at this during peace,	7
Amount required during war,	8
Fundamental question now at issue—Is drill or discipline the first requisite of troops?	9
Comparison of the two,	10
Value attached by great commanders to old and disciplined troops,	11
Discipline more valuable than mere drill in war,	13
Proofs of this,	14
New theory on this subject,	16
Lessons taught by the North American contest,	17
On the German war of 1866,	20
Original landwehr system of Prussia,	21
Organisation substituted for it in 1859-60,	22
Opinion of General Von Moltke on the cause of the defeat of the Austrian army in 1866,	25

Lessons taught by the Sedova campaign,	26
Guiding principles of Prussian military organisation,	29
How far applicable to this country,	31

CHAPTER II.

System of enlistment now in use in our army,	33
Period when the value of the soldier begins to diminish,	34
Inapplicability of short enlistments to our service, and value of old soldiers in it,	35
Evils arising from the system of increasing regiments by volunteering,	36
Proposal for a new system of recruiting,	38
Want of a reserve of trained soldiers for the regular army,	39
Principles which must be observed in the formation of a reserve,	40
Proposal for the formation of one,	40
Its extent and value,	42
A line reserve preferable to a militia one,	43
Value of the volunteer force,	44
In regard to drill,	45
And to discipline,	46
Conditions of service in the field,	48
How the volunteers can be most usefully employed,	50
Unity the first requisite of military administration,	51
Now being applied to the supply department,	53
Ought to be applied to the War Office and Horse Guards,	55
Proposed scheme to effect this,	56
On the patronage of the army,	58
Reserve forces should be under the Commander-in-Chief,	59
Proposed organisation in this respect,	60
Half-pay officers should be employed in the reserve,	62
The militia,	63
Test to ascertain if the reserve organisation is worth its cost,	64

CONTENTS.

ix

On reductions in the army,	72

CHAPTER III.

Mode of treating the subject,	76
Organisation of the North German army,	77
Of the French army,	79
And of the Austrian army,	82
Comparative pressure of the three army systems on the population in time of peace,	85
And in time of war,	87
Effect of these systems on the armies as machines of war,	90
On the standing army,	90
On the reserve of the standing army,	92
And on the landwehr,	94
Statistical table of the principal European armies,	97

CHAPTER IV.

New principle introduced into the continental armies,	98
The division of labour the mark of progress in all occupa- tions,	99
Is the army alone an exception to this law?	100
Complicated weapons of modern warfare,	101
Comparatively little effect produced by them in recent battles,	102
Reason of this,	103
A short-service conscriptive army cheap to the treasury,	104
Fighting power of a long-service army greater than that of a short,	105
