ON VIEWING A LANDSCAPE IN LANCASHIRE

Though out of hearing of the world I sing
And to unheeding ears, the more do I
Cherish my scornéd pipe, nor lay it by,
Nor, for what tears or laughter it may bring,
Can I cease uttering that impetuous note
Which for pure joy on this free air doth float.

Beholding thee, dear native North Country,
I glow with passion that I cannot write:
Passion that subtly takes me at the sight
Of each grim hedge, each bitter holly tree,
Each bristling bed of gorse, each upland lawn
Where larks and throstles sing against the dawn.

Precious the view outspread on either hand:

Here, where harsh lonely pastures barely keep
Slow-moving, leisured cattle, nibbling sheep;
Down there the river, smooth-laid meadow land,
Sharp mounting to this bleak, thorn-crested lea,
Unteranted of all the world—save me.

PREFACE

The author's grateful acknowledgments are due to the Editor of The Nation, the Editor of The Academy, and to the Principal of the Ladies' College, Cheltenham, for their kind permission to reprint poems that have appeared in the pages of The Speaker, Literature, and in The Ladies' College Magasine.

SONGS OF THE UPLANDS

TO "PIERS PLOWMAN"

Glorious uplands Sweeping to skyward, Ribbed with the seams of Ancient furrows, Wind-laid, rush-tufted, Ridging the barrow, Ploughed there of old time By some grave husbandman, Sturdy Piers Plowman, Our foremost father, Who, as he mounted the Lea with his oxen, Here haply breathed a space, Gazed on the welkin, Down in the west there Watched the sun setting, Then slowly nightwards, Stallwards he drove them; Hedged his rude implement, Stabled his oxen,
