JOB XXXIII. 8.

"Oh, that I knew where I might find Him!"

THESE pathetic words of the inspired and suffering Gentile express the universal instinct of mankind. The rudest nations of bygone days and far off lands, encamping beside the rivers beneath the shade of the trees, have listened for God's voice in the rushing of the waters and the rustling of the leaves. The wondrous beauty of creation has preached to them of the might and majesty of the Creator: the best of them have often sought Him, struggling through the little light vouchsafed to their weak and wandering souls: each one has been conscious of a vague unsatisfied longing within, which things merely human could never set at rest: "Oh, that I "knew where I might find Him," is the sigh of
