TO
MY TWO COMPANIONS
ON MANY PLEASANT JOURNEYS

PREFACE

IN looking through the various guide-books of all kinds which accumulate in the course of travel, it occurred to me that there was none intended especially for the use of women, to suggest what they had better take with them in going abroad for the first time, and to tell them how they can get about most comfortably after landing.

Year by year an increasing number of women travel in Europe, often in parties which do not include a man, and there is no reason why they should not, as the pleasure and profit to be gained are far more than worth the trouble which must be taken, while that is less in many ways than in this country, because in the places which most people wish to visit everything has long been organized with reference to the convenience of tourists.

Crossing the ocean, however, differs from an ordinary journey, and, after one has landed, whether in England or on the Continent, everything at first seems unfamiliar. The rules as to the registration of luggage, the system of hotel management, and the fees or tips which must be constantly given, are only a few instances of the wide differences which exist between the conditions of travel here and in Europe, while there are many little comforts of which one appreciates the value through having forgotten to bring them.

Most of us have to learn by the slow and laborious process of asking questions, taking advice, and, above all, by making mistakes; but it is at least possible to offer the result of one's personal experience, and that of other women, which is what I have tried to do in the following pages.

At the end of the book I have given a comparative table of the different thermometers used in Europe, a few of the metric measures and weights, with our equivalents for them, a number of words which are used in a different sense here and in England, as well as French terms which are often wrongly translated, and some simple phrases in French, Italian, and German. There is also a list of guide-books, and of some works of history or fiction relating to certain places; this does not claim to be complete, but may be of interest.

If my work has any value, the credit is in a great part due to the friends who have helped me with their criticism and counsel, and to them I offer here my heartiest thanks.

MARY CADWALADER JONES.
