PREFATORY NOTE

A MAN may not honestly excuse himself for saying what he thinks to be true and useful. Yet, if apology were needed for the critical tone of these chapters, it could be found in the example set by military chaplains and others, who, having seen customary methods of Christian work, as they understand it, to be ill-adapted to the new age, have felt bound to say so.

The advance of the Catholic Religion is at least as important a subject as "the failure of the churches." One obscure Anglo-Catholic believes that our movement needs a change of outlook if it is to continue to be an instrument of that advance; and this book expounds that theory, whatever it may be worth.

Nevertheless, if anything here lacks respect for the experience of seniors, let it be considered as addressed only to those who, like the writer, are still on the omniscient side of forty.
