PREFACE

THE essay with which this book commences sufficiently explains the thoughts, emotions, and circumstances in which the book has found its origin.

The addresses which it contains were in all but three instances delivered in the course of my mission at Plymouth Church, Brooklyn. As they were in the main extempore utterances, my only way of giving them permanence has been to consult the columns of the Brooklyn Eagle, in which verbatim reports appeared. I had no opportunity of revising these daily reports, and while my hearty thanks are due to the skill of the reporter, it will be easily conceived that many verbal errors and some misinterpretations of thought occurred. These errors and misinterpretations I have now corrected. Nevertheless I have thought it wise not to alter the form of the addresses. They remain addresses; they are not essays.

The addresses in this volume which were not actually delivered to American audiences are two: that upon "Christ Among the Common Things of Life," and the address on "Saving
