GENERAL STATEMENT.

---

Instruction in History and Political Science in the University of Michigan is organized to meet the many and varied ends for which students may pursue studies along these lines. It includes studies in History and Government, in Political Economy and Finance, in Commerce and Industry, in Sociology, in International Law, in Commercial Law, in the Application of Science to Industry, and in other allied subjects. The purpose of this Announcement is to give a concise statement of the general aims of the instruction in this group of studies, as also of the principles which control their administration.

HISTORY.

The purpose of the work in History is to provide for a broad and comprehensive study of history, and for adequate training in the critical and constructive use of the historical method of investigation. The place which history holds in the general scheme of education requires the Departments of History to co-operate with all departments of the University, and to adjust the courses of instruction which they offer to the needs of all students, in whatever line of work they may be interested. The needs of students who find their chief interest in language, literature, philosophy, or science are held in mind in the adjustment of this work, as well as of those who devote themselves primarily to the study of political and social science. The courses offered in history are as comprehensive as the considerations thus suggested. Some of these are designed to give a general survey of the history of Europe, and of America, and of the temporary conditions of Asia and Africa.

Others, more special in character, are devoted to the study of comparatively limited fields of investigation, or to work in which the element of research predominates. These more special courses comprise the higher work in history. They are designed for students who wish to prepare themselves for teaching history and political science, and for candidates for the higher degrees specializing along these lines.

POLITICAL SCIENCE.

Under the phrase, political science, is included a large number of courses upon diverse topics which have for their chief purpose to familiarize the student with established political, industrial, and social institutions, and to cultivate the power of critical analysis and comparison. All of these courses rest upon history, and the greater number of them conform to the historical method of presentation. Under the system of free elections which obtains in the University of Michigan, these courses may be followed as the major part of a general education, or as the minor part of an education devoted primarily to some other group of studies, and when pursued in this manner their administration conforms to the general rules laid down by the Department of Literature, Science, and the Arts, and by the Graduate School.

Courses in Political Science may also be regarded as technical or semi-professional in character, and may be followed by students as preparatory to some chosen profession or career. When so followed their administration is brought under the direction of special committees whose chief service it is to arrange a program of study pertinent to the peculiar purpose held in mind. This phase of organization is somewhat new in the University of Michigan, and for that reason is made the occasion of special comment.

SPECIAL COURSES.

Among the technical or semi-professional aims of instruction in History and Political Science, mention may be made of preparation for the social phase of pastoral work; for that broad line of duties suggested by the phrase philanthropic service; for the career of a newspaper writer, so far as that implies insight into social, political, and industrial conditions; for the various specialized branches of public service; for the teaching of history and political science; for the study of the law; and for the higher grades of a business career.

In the case of students preparing themselves for the study of the law, for commerce, and for public administration, special courses have been organized, known, respectively as,—

The Combined Course in Collegiate and Law Studies.

The Course in Higher Commercial Education, and,—

The Course in Public Administration.

For a detailed description of these "Special Courses" see pages 26 to 32 inclusive.

RELATION TO OTHER DEPARTMENTS OF INSTRUCTION.

Among the peculiar advantages offered students who pursue History and Political Science because of their technical or semi-professional character, is the opportunity of hearing lectures in other departments of the University and in other branches of study. The Department of Law offers many courses of peculiar interest to students of commerce and of public administration. The Department of Medicine and Surgery provides instruction in hygiene and sanitary science for those who desire to specialize in municipal administration. Special lectures for the commercial and social application of chemistry and physics are given by the members of the scientific department. It is regarded as one of the marked advantages of the Univer-
