P R E F A C E .

THE following pages were, some years ago, prepared for the press. Having long admired the character, and enquired much into the History of Sir Thomas More, I had often seen cause to regret the hasty, and all but universal, adoption of some injurious charges, with regard to a part of that eminent individual's public conduct, which, made at first on the authority of enemies, have been printed and reprinted, believed and commented upon, in total disregard to the evidence on which
