A MASTER OF FORTUNE.

Part 1.

CHAPTER I.

IT was after twelve, and the river lay in a blaze of summer light when Carteret and Seafeld rowed up in their pair-oar to bathe at the weir. A melancholy brooded on the stream in spite of all the dancing of myriads of sunbeams, in spite of the glad voices of younger boys sporting in and out of the water at "Upper Hope" and at "Athens," names eloquent of the future and of the past. It was their last
