

JOHN CHILCOTE, OR, THE MASQUERADERS

Published @ 2017 Trieste Publishing Pty Ltd

ISBN 9780649383368

John Chilcote, or, The masqueraders by Katherine Cecil Thurston

Except for use in any review, the reproduction or utilisation of this work in whole or in part in any form by any electronic, mechanical or other means, now known or hereafter invented, including xerography, photocopying and recording, or in any information storage or retrieval system, is forbidden without the permission of the publisher, Trieste Publishing Pty Ltd, PO Box 1576 Collingwood, Victoria 3066 Australia.

All rights reserved.

Edited by Trieste Publishing Pty Ltd.
Cover @ 2017

This book is sold subject to the condition that it shall not, by way of trade or otherwise, be lent, re-sold, hired out, or otherwise circulated without the publisher's prior consent in any form or binding or cover other than that in which it is published and without a similar condition including this condition being imposed on the subsequent purchaser.

www.triestepublishing.com

KATHERINE CECIL THURSTON

JOHN CHILCOTE,
OR, THE MASQUERADERS

JOHN CHILCOTE
OR
THE MASQUERADERS
BY

KATHERINE CECIL THURSTON

*Author of "The Gambler," "The Liar, or, The Circle,"
"The Climax."*

Reprinted From Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine.

CHICAGO.
DONOHUE & OGILVIE.

JOHN CHILCOTE;
OR,
THE MASQUERADERS.

CHAPTER I.

Two incidents widely different in character, yet bound together by results, marked the night of January the 23rd. On that night the blackest fog within a four years' memory fell upon certain portions of London; and also on that night came the first announcement of the border risings against the Persian Government in the province of Khorasan—the announcement that, speculated upon, even smiled at, at the time—assumed such significance in the light of after-events.

At eight o'clock the news began to spread through the House of Commons; but at nine men in the inner lobbies were gossiping, not so much upon how far Russia, while ostensibly upholding the Shah, had pulled the strings by which the insurgents danced, as upon the manner in which "The St. George's Gazette"—the Tory evening newspaper—had seized upon the incident and practically shaken it in the faces of the Government.

More than once, Lakeley—the owner and editor of "The St. George's"—had stepped out of the decorous circle of tradition and taken a plunge into modern journalism; but to-night he essayed deeper waters than before, and under an almost sensational heading declared that in this apparently innocent border rising we had less an outcome of mere race antagonism than a first faint index of a long-cherished Russian scheme, that was growing to a gradual maturity under the "drift" policy of the present British Government.

The effect produced by this pronouncement, if strong, was varied. Members of the Opposition saw, or thought they saw, a reflection of it in the exaggerated unconcern on the Ministerial benches; and the Government had an uneasy sense that behind the newly kindled interest on the other side of the House lay some mysterious scenting of battle from afar off. But though these impressions ran like electricity through the atmosphere, nothing tangible marked their passage, and the ordinary business of the House proceeded until half-past eleven, when an adjournment was moved.

The first man to hurry from his place was John Chilcote, member for East Wark. He walked out of the House quickly, with the half-furtive quickness that marks a self-absorbed man, and as he passed the policeman standing stolidly under the arched doorway of the big courtyard he swerved a little, as if startled out of his thoughts. He realized his swerve almost before it was accomplished, and pulled himself together with nervous irritability.

"Foggy night, constable!" he said with elaborate carelessness.

"Foggy night, sir, and thickening up west," responded the man.

"Ah, indeed!" Chilcote's answer was vague. The constable's cheery voice jarred on him, and for the second time he was conscious of a senseless irritation. Without a further glance at the man he stepped out into the courtyard and turned towards the main gate.

At the gateway two cab-lamps showed through the mist of shifting fog like the eyes of a great cat, and the familiar "Hansom, sir?" came to him indistinctly.

He paused by force of custom and, stepping forward, had almost touched the open door of the vehicle when a new impulse caused him to draw back.

"No," he said hurriedly. "No; I'll walk."

The cabman muttered, lashed his horse, and with a clatter of hoofs and harness wheeled away, while Chilcote, still with uncertain hastiness, crossed the road in the direction of Whitehall.

About the Abbey the fog had partially lifted, and in the railed garden that faces the Houses of Parliament the statues were visible in a spectral way. But Chilcote's glance was unstable and indifferent; he skirted the railings heedlessly, and crossing the road with the speed of long familiarity, gained Whitehall on the left-hand side.

There, the fog had dropped, and to any one looking upward towards Trafalgar Square it would have seemed that the chain of lamps extended little farther than the Horse Guards, and that beyond lay a void.

Unconscious of this capricious alternation between darkness and light, Chilcote continued his course. To a close observer the manner of his going had both interest and suggestion, for though he walked on, apparently self-engrossed, yet at every trivial touch or sound he started, like a man whose nervous system is painfully overstrung.

Maintaining his haste, he went deliberately forward, oblivious of the fact that at each step the curtain of darkness about him became closer, damper, more tangible; that each second the passers-by jostled each other with greater frequency, while the scraps of conversation that reached him became more dubious and indistinct. Then abruptly, with a sudden realization of what had happened, he stood quite still. Without anticipation or preparation he had walked full into the thickness of the fog—a thickness so dense that, as by an enchanter's wand, the shadowy figures of a moment before melted, and the street lamps were sucked up into the night.

His first feeling was a sense of panic at the sudden isolation, his second a thrill of nervous apprehension at the oblivion that had allowed him to be so entrapped. The second feeling out-weighed the first. He moved forward, then paused again, uncertain of himself. Finally, with the consciousness that inaction was unbearable, he moved on once more—his eyes wide open, one hand thrust out as a protection and guide.

The fog had closed in behind as heavily as in front, shutting off all possibility of retreat; all about him in the darkness was a confusion of voices—cheerful, uncertain, alarmed, or angry; now and then a sleeve brushed his or a hand touched him tentatively. It was a strange moment—a moment of possibilities, to which the crunching wheels, the oaths and laughter from the blocked traffic of the roadway, made a continuous accompaniment.

Keeping well to the left, he still beat on; there was a persistence in his movements that almost amounted to fear—a fear born of the solitude filled with innumerable sounds. For a space he groped about him without result, then his fingers touched the cold surface of a shuttered shop-front, and a thrill of reassurance passed through him. With renewed haste, and clinging to his landmark as a blind man might, he started forward with a fresh impetus.

For a dozen paces he moved rapidly and unevenly, then the inevitable occurred. He collided with a man coming in the opposite direction.

The shock was abrupt. Both men swore simultaneously, then both laughed. The whole thing was casual, but Chilcote was in that state of mind when even the commonplace becomes abnormal. The other man's exclamation, the other man's laugh, struck on his nerves; coming out of the darkness, they sounded like an echo of his own.

Yet nine out of every ten men in London, given the same social position and the same education, might reasonably be expected to express annoyance or amusement in the same manner, possibly in the same tone of voice; and Chilcote remembered this almost at the moment of his nervous jar.

"Beastly fog!" he said aloud. "I'm trying to get to Grosvenor Square, but the chances seem rather small."

The other laughed again, and again the laugh upset Chilcote. He wondered uncomfortably if he was becoming a prey to illusions. But the stranger spoke before the question had solved itself.

"I'm afraid they are small," he said. "It would almost be hard to find one's way to the devil on a night like this."

Chilcote made a murmur of amusement and drew back against the shop-front.

"Yes. We can see now where the blind man scores in the matter of salvation," he said. "This is almost a repetition of the fog of six years ago. Were you out in that?" It was a habit of his to jump from one sentence to another—a habit that had grown upon him of late.

"No." The stranger had also groped his way towards the shop. "No; I was out of England six years ago."

"You were lucky." Chilcote turned up the collar of his coat. "That was an atrocious fog—as black as this one but more general. I remember it well. It was the night Lexington made his great sugar speech. Some of us were found on Lambeth Bridge at three in the morning, having left the House at twelve."

Chilcote seldom indulged in reminiscences, but this conversation with an unseen companion was more like a soliloquy than a dialogue. He was almost surprised into an exclamation when the other caught up his words.

"Ah! The sugar speech!" he said. "Odd that I should have been looking it up only yesterday. What a magnificent dressing up of a dry subject it was. What a career Lexington promised in those days."

Chilcote changed his position.

"You are interested in the muddle down at Westminster?" he asked sarcastically.

"I——?" It was the turn of the other to draw back. "Oh, I read my newspaper with the other five million, that is all. I am an outsider." His voice sounded curt; the warmth that admiration had brought into it was suddenly frozen.

"An outsider!" Chilcote repeated. "What an enviable word!"

"Possibly—to those who are well inside the ring. But let us go back to Lexington. What a pinnacle the man reached—and what a drop he had! It has always seemed to me an extraordinary instance of the human leaven running through us all." He paused thoughtfully; then again his voice sounded through the darkness. "What was the real cause of his collapse?" he asked suddenly. "Was it drugs or drink? I have often wished to get at the truth."

Again Chilcote changed his attitude.

"Is truth ever worth getting at?" he asked irrelevantly.

"In the case of a public man—yes. He exchanges his privacy for the interest of the masses. If he gives the masses the details of his success, why not the details of his failure? Was it drink that sucked him under?"

"No." Chilcote's response came after a pause.

"Drugs?"

Again Chilcote hesitated. And at the moment of his hesitation a woman brushed past him, laughing boisterously. The sound jarred him.

"Was it drugs?" the stranger went on easily. "I have always had a theory that it was."

"Yes. It was morphia." The answer came before Chilcote had realized it. The woman's laugh and the stranger's quiet persistence had contrived to draw it from him. Instantly he had spoken he looked about him quickly like one who has for a moment forgotten a necessary vigilance.

There was silence while the other thought over the information. Then he spoke again, with a new touch of vehemence.

"So I imagined," he said, "though, on my soul, I scarcely credited it. To have gained so much—and to have thrown it away for a common vice!" He made an exclamation of disgust.

Chilcote gave an unsteady laugh. "You judge hardly," he said.

The other repeated his sound of contempt. "Justly so. No man has the right to squander what another would give his soul for. It lessens the general respect for power."

"You are a believer in power?" Again Chilcote's tone was sarcastic, but the sarcasm sounded thin,