PREFACE.

WHILE the Americans are painted in most diverging colours ; while by some individuals the institutions of the United States are recommended to the Europeans as the only political system worthy of their imitation, and by others the stability of these institutions, even in America, is much doubted ; and while annually so large a number of Europeans flock to America as to a land of golden promise, the Author of the following Remarks will, he hopes, not be deemed guilty of vanity or presumption, when, under these circumstances, he has thought it no useless task to sift the truth from falsehood ; and, by submitting those different opinions and representations to the stern test of reason, to lift the veil of mystery.

September 1832.
