A Selection of Opinions from the British Press.

ENGLISH.

"These 'Songs of Killarney' are natural music. It is impossible to read them in a dull moment without having the incubus of care removed from the mind. Song itself, in its best sense, seems to be almost dying out amongst us. In the conviction that the writer of 'Songs of Killarney' is to be classed amongst its renovators, we now part from him, with the desire of finding his talents ripened when next we meet with him."—Fraser's Magazine, August, 1873.

"The poetical humour of the book touches with just that delicate ease and vivacity which it is so difficult for ordinary mortals to attain, subjects which interest the heart—but it only touches them, and plays with them with a sportiveness that enhances the tenderness of the touch. Irish poetic humour is almost unrivalled, and could hardly be better represented than in 'Songs of Killarney.'"—The Spectator, January 3rd, 1874.

"We have seldom read any poems which are more thoroughly Irish in the best sense."—The Athenæum, 1873.

"Some of the 'Songs of Killarney' have a freshness, naturalness, and humour which are irresistible. We have read the book with unmixed pleasure."—The Daily News, October 6th, 1873.

IRISH.

"The author's humour is quite characteristic of the people, and his love tales are certain to win him popularity."—Freeman's Journal, June 3rd, 1873.

"'The Rose of Killarney,' 'Fixin' the Day,' 'The Potato Blossom,' and 'The Invention of Wine,' may fairly claim a place in any future 'Golden Treasury of Irish Poetry.'"—The Irish Times, July 14th, 1873.

"The reader will discern indications of high poetic talent."—Dublin Daily Express, May 31st, 1873.

"A series of Irish lyrics which supply a real want. . . . Fresh as winds blowing over heather, full of glow and colour, and fraught with a genuine sense of nature."—Cork Constitution, 1873.

"In simplicity," Mr. Graves "possesses at least an advantage over our greatest song-writers—Moore and Lover."—Limerick Reporter, May 20th, 1873.

SCOTCH.

"Not only witty, but humorous, and lit up with flashes of genuine poetry."—The Scotsman, June 13th, 1873.

"Lively, sparkling, and descriptive of an arch, humorous, but true-hearted people."—Edinburgh Courant, June 16th, 1873.
