PREFACE.

It would be a manifest impertinence for the writer of this brief book to name the professors in Union Theological Seminary to whom he is under a sense of grateful obligation. For he is still a student in that institution and is working in regular course for its diploma. But he is unwilling to let these pages be printed without saying how greatly he is indebted to Professors Gottheil and Prince of Columbia University. Both have shown him, to his frequent despair, what it is to be a Semitic scholar. Without the suggestion and stimulus of the former, chapter IV of this thesis would not have been written at all. Without the wonderfully helpful encouragement of the latter, the writer, much as he enjoys the oriental languages, might sometimes have lost heart in studying them.
