"Under an assumed controversial form, these Letters are distinctly authoritative—as indeed might be expected from such a master of the art; and under the heads of apparently discursive dissertations, they collect all the decisions afforded by hard experience as to the value of current, and in many cases rather conflicting, theories concerning the true part of artillery in war."—Saturday Review.

THE Letters on Cavalry of Prince Kraft of Hohenlohe Ingelfingen, of which the following volume contains a translation, formed originally the first part of his papers on the Three Arms ; they have been included in the present edition as being necessary in order to form a complete tactical series, but the order of succession has been changed as, since no new regulations have appeared in Germany with regard to the movements of Cavalry, it was considered that there was less need to present them at the earliest possible moment, there being no opportunity of comparing them with recent official opinions.

These letters, like the others, have been reprinted from the Proceedings of the Royal Artillery Institution, and I beg to return my most sincere thanks to the Committee for their kind permission to use the maps which accompanied that issue.
