Thesis of the present chapter, against that idea . . .	43
Examination of some of the pleas for error	45
I. That a false opinion may be clothed with good associations	45
II. That all minds are not open to reason	47
III. That a false opinion, considered in relation to the general mental attitude, may be less hurt- ful than its premature demolition	50
IV. That mere negative proof is not a guide . . .	57
V. That error has been a stopping-stone to truth .	58
We cannot tell how much truth has been missed . . .	62
Inevitableness is not utility	65
