INTRODUCTION.

The present booklet does not give a tithe of the copy prepared for the press after all manner of reluctant reduction and sifting. Sooth to say, half a score of volumes of identical quality should still leave many to be sought out by the 'gentle reader' (to return on the old kindly phrase). Was it Sheridan who said of the notorious Dr. Dodd's 'Beauties of Shakespeare,' 'Yes; very good—but where are the rest?' I fear the same retort may be made upon me, and, indeed, in relation to the entire series of which this forms one. But be it remembered extenuatingly, that one 'motif' in the preparation of this Elizabethan Library is to stimulate, not to exhaust, interest in the supreme literature of those 'spacious days.' That 'motif' will be defeated unless in each successive case our relatively slight readings send our readers to the complete works.
