PREFACE

The following study deals with selected problems concerning the moral and religious consciousness and is determined accordingly in scope and method. The treatment of religion is limited to what may be considered its relation to morality. The problems selected are of universal interest, and require the attention especially of students of ethics and religion to whom it is hoped this discussion may be helpful. The point of view is empirical and largely psychological. The exponent numbers in the text indicate corresponding notes and references which show in part the indebtedness to others. No further bibliography is presented. The sectional analysis of each chapter is intended to serve as a guide to the reader and also as a part of the index.
