ADVERTISEMENT.

To Mr. James's able Novel of the "KING'S HIGHWAY," I am indebted for the Plot of this Drama, and I take this opportunity of acknowledging my obligation in this particular respect, and also of thanking the distinguished Author for many an hour of sweet instructive beguilement, enjoyed in the perusal of his productions.

For his careful revision of the MS. and for superintending the press, I return my hearty acknowledgments to my friend W. A. Dow, Esq., King's Bench Walk, Temple.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—LORD BYERDALE'S Study.—WILTON seated at a table in the act of writing.—Several folded letters before him, other letters lying open, papers, &c.

Wil.—THAT memory should feed itself! wax stronger
In its impression, without agency
Of that which wrought it; till the simulation—
For e'en so much it is—grows palpable
As the original—holds commune with
Our ears and eyes, yet all's within ourself!
At first her image was a dreamy thing
That came and went, and might, for aught I deem'd,
Have gone for ever—now 'tis ever with me!
Substantial presence! steadfast constancy!
I write, I read, I talk, and breaking off
In listless absence, to myself return
In company with her! She is my theme
That supersedes all others! Why is this?
What do I nourish? Hope in spite of hope!
Madness of wishes—never to be bless'd!
Her groom is not beneath her more than I,
The secretary of a haughty lord!
His clerk!—that in his counsels holds no share
More than his pen! What better should I be,
A man who claims no core of kith or kin
In the wide world! I had a friend—a good
And gracious one—who foster'd me, to play
A higher part. Compell'd by urgent cause
