Charles the Chauffeur

I

“WHEN I came to be Mrs. Thurlow’s shawfer,” said Charles, “the first thing she asked me was: ‘Mr. Charles, are your nerves steady?’”

“How can I ever forget the sweetness of the dear little woman’s voice? Though I wouldn’t want her to find out I said so—just now. The next day she told me she wanted me to take her to the park in the runabout, so she could see how I performed. It was a munificent day. Before we had went a mile—and how red her cheeks were—she said: ‘Charles, you seem to know all about it. You might see how near you can come to that old man without hittin’ him.’”

“The old gent was just startin’ across the street about a hundred yards in front of us
