(Pioneer Series)

The Saturday Review.—"Mr. Stephen Crane's picture of the effect of actual fighting on a raw regiment is simply unapproached in intimate knowledge and sustained imaginative strength. In the supreme moments of the fight he is possessed by the fiery breath of battle, and finds an inspired utterance that will reach the universal heart of man. This extraordinary book will appeal strongly to the insatiable desire to know the psychology of war—how the sights and sounds, the terrible details of the drama of battle, affect the senses and the soul of man."

The Speaker.—"Every page is crowded, not merely with incidents such as the war correspondent describes, but with the tragedy of life. The reader sees the battle, not from afar, but from the inside. He hears the laboured breathing of the wearied soldiers, sees the colour rising and falling in their cheeks, and feels at heart as they themselves did in this first act in the tremendous drama which so many people talk about and so few understand. . . . As a work of art, 'The Red Badge of Courage' deserves high praise. As a moral lesson that mankind still needs, the praise it deserves is higher still."

St. James's Gazette.—"This is not merely a remarkable book; it is a revelation. Mr. Crane has laid the War God on the dissecting-table, and exposed his every bone and nerve and sinew and artery to the public gaze."

The Daily Telegraph.—"The book is partly an analysis of courage, partly an extremely vivid and closely realised history of the incidents and conditions of battle. The scenes which depict Jim Conklin's death, and the strange demeanour of the tattered soldier, grip one's heart with an intensity not easily to be forgotten. The reader cannot put down 'The Red Badge of Courage' before its last page. It is assuredly to the credit of Mr. Crane that he sets us thinking about the curious ups and downs, failings and fortitudes, basenesses and altitudes in our common human nature."

The Daily Chronicle.—"Mr. Kipling has shown us the private soldier in barrack and camp. Mr. Crane brings him into action. . . . This, we feel instinctively, is something like the reality of war. Mr. Crane's book, we repeat, is a really fine achievement."

A Child of the Streets

BY STEPHEN CRANE

12mo, cloth, gilt top, 2s.

The Literary World.—"Contains all the force, all the power, and all the horrible reality which Mr. Crane has proved his pen to possess."

The Pall Mall Gazette.—"It is by no means a pleasant story, but it is a strong one and a true one."

The St. James's Gazette.—"Mr. Crane has produced a powerful study, and its truth of characterisation and vigour of impersonal presentation confirm the hopes of his future career founded on the originality and vivacity of 'The Red Badge of Courage.'"

The Daily News.—"Terribly truthful. The interest of the narrative lies in the subtlety and the uncompromising directness with which the writer exhibits the influences of surroundings upon the natures of his heroine and her brother."

The Globe.—"A striking little story, full of graphic power."

Vanity Fair.—"It all reads true as gospel; the material has evidently been got at first hand; it is distinctly a work of observation, illuminated by imagination. It is written, too, in a cold impersonal way that is very effective. Mr. Crane is a vivisectionist, and has explored his characters clear through to the marrow. The enthusiastic adherents of realism will have their fill in this book, and what they don't know about the Bowery after they finish will not be worth knowing. Mr. Crane can convey more in a line than most writers can pack into a page."

The Scotsman.—"A powerful piece of work, full of vigorous touches, and with much of the pathetic humour of real life."

The Leeds Mercury.—"A powerful and realistic story, and one which only a cynic could read unmoved."

The Birmingham Gazette.—"There is a great deal of power in this story of squalid life. Maggie is finely and pathetically sketched."
