INTRODUCTORY NOTE

IN the preparation of this volume I have not consulted the trinity—Exegesis, Homiletics and Logic—and it is probable that there have been grave crimes committed against each of them. I have taken a few—not all—of the New Testament characters other than the Apostles, and have striven to point out a few of the places where Jesus Christ touched their experiences, believing that human nature remains constant throughout the centuries, and that what was helpful to mankind two thousand years ago will be helpful to him to-day.

It has not been my purpose to make these studies expository as such. If any are in search of grammatical niceties or models of exegesis, they are referred to the critical and explanatory commentaries, and such other works as deal with the constructive speech of the New Testament. I have set forth with the deliberate intention of forgetting the hard-and-fast rules of homiletics. Far be it from me to pull the petals from
