CONTENTS.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION.

Want of a work entering into a practicable method of obtaining the land for the people and of managing it when obtained—Insufficiency of H. George's works in this respect—Scheme for obtaining the land by gradually increasing the Land Tax condemned—Confiscation condemned . . . . . 1

CHAPTER II.

How to obtain the Land—This must be a compromise—Can't get out of a false position without loss—Compensation scheme quickest and most equitable—Impossible to set things right all at once, no forced means will do it—Danger of any other method—Scheme for compensation—Tables showing how many years it would take to buy out the landowners simply by devoting all increase of rent to that purpose . . . . . 6

CHAPTER III.

Principles on which the land should be valued—Basis present yearly values—Speculative value not allowed—Rating land at its value instead of its use—Order in which first valuation should proceed—Difficulty of separating tenant-right from ground-rent exists in any scheme—Valuation should be carefully and scientifically made . . . . . 17

CHAPTER IV.

The fundamental principle on which the State should manage the land—Here there is no compromise—Here we have merely to follow loyally ideal justice—If once this path be deviated from justice becomes impossible and compromise begins—Necessity of beginning right and making foundations firm—Universal reign of material laws acknowledged—The supremacy of the moral law—Certainty of punishment if not obeyed—No compromise in the moral law—We must go back to first principles—We must not tamper with the land question—Public spirit necessary for the health of a nation—Just laws will foster it, unjust destroy it—Privileged classes the result of unjust laws and the enemies of public spirit—Man's right to all that he makes as an individual, to equal rights to the earth, right of the community to all that is made by the community collectively, are the leading principles rigidly to be adhered to . 23

CHAPTER V.

State management of the land—General scheme—How the land should be let—Main features and rules—All-importance of a reliable and market ground-rent and not a fixed one enlarged upon—How labourers will obtain their allotments—The Government would in no way interfere with private management of land—Would not dismiss a tenant unless rent was not paid—Would not take one unless land was thrown on its hands—Competition rents would not mean rack-renting—Large incomes, although spent amongst workers, are not spent for their benefit—Peasant proprietorship no remedy—Irish Land Act only a makeshift—Who the first tenants of the State should be—The rich could not outbid the poor—All-importance of competition rents—Harmony of economic laws truly worked out with the moral law—How the penniless will derive benefit—How the poor will obtain access to the land—The element of time necessary to develop advantages—Rent a necessary means of justice . . . . . 31

CHAPTER VI.

Valuation—Difficulty of separating tenant-right from ground-rent—Way to do it in town and in country—Details of country valuation—Simplicity of State management—Advantages illustrated . . . . . 50

CHAPTER VII.

A sketch of some of the direct effects in town or country—Also on colonisation, war, and social distinction—Effect on towns illustrated—Action in villages explained, and probability of manufactures being worked in conjunction with agriculture—Effect on stopping the exodus of unskilled labour from country into towns—Benefit to farmers—Benefit to the country at large—Game Laws—Parks and country beauties—Beneficial effect on our colonies and improved relations with the inferior races—Disappearance of war—Tendency to abolish social lines . . . . . 57

CHAPTER VIII.

The effect of the unequal distribution of wealth on depression in trade—The necessary elements for trade always with us—Over-supply theory nonsense—Speculation in land one cause—Inequality of wealth the principal cause, aided by changes in fashion—Demoralising influences of fluctuations in trade—Sufficiency of capital certain without rich men . . . . . 67

CHAPTER IX.

Capital: The source of its power, its true position, its uses, its fate—Different classes of investment—Table—Openings that are indefensible and defensible—Businesses in their nature monopolies ought to be managed and owned by the State—Dishonesty not encouraged by this—Interest justifiable as long as it can be obtained by fair means—Nature of wealth—Competition of capital—Destruction of capital—Possibility of saving wealth—Functions of wealth—Capital only a means to an end—Oppressive only by being able to buy rights of oppression—Investment in land practically makes interest certain—Abolish such investments, and interest would fall or disappear—Provision for old age—Co-operation probable—Competition of labour healthy, with equal rights to land—Large fortunes could be made, but no income in perpetuity—Professional classes . . . . . 73

CHAPTER X.

Population—What grounds are there for thinking there are too many people?—A country gathering part of its food supplies from another is no proof—Home industry is not necessarily discouraged—Malthusian theory not applicable to England—Moral restraint no good for public reasons, only for private—Forty years ago we found it as difficult to find employment as we do now—Even small patches of poor, thickly-populated land does not necessarily show over-population but only maladjustment—Landowners' views of over-population . . . . . 97

CHAPTER XI.

CONCLUSION.

Rapid growth of the movement—Reason why the institution of private ownership in land can be overthrown—Difficulties and dangers—Revolution of some sort inevitable—Political action of the wealthy—Political action of the poor—Instinctive love of justice—The duty of leaders—No time to be lost—Summary of argument—Concluding observations . . . . . 109
