INTRODUCTION.

As these Riddles have not been written for either Children or Adults exclusively, it will not be objected that some of the subjects chosen are very much involved, and others very thinly disguised; nor will it be deemed a serious defect, if, as the Author is willing to admit, some of the pieces may be open to the charge of being rather poems than puzzles, when it is understood that it has been his ambition to make them no less the one than the other.

Facility of discovery means laxity of research; and as it has been the Author's aim to furnish a new incentive to the closer study of the narrative portions of Scripture, this, with the fact that all the subjects are taken from one Book, and the belief that the enigmas are all so constructed as to be incapable of two solutions, has induced him to publish the answers in a separate form. [See announcement at the end of the book.]
