THE following story, which obtained such a wide popularity on its production, is of a kind that will not soon become out of date for young people. The fresh charm of the old northern life which it depicts, the fidelity and vividness with which the details of that life are represented, and the keen yet healthy interest aroused by the narrative, are such as to make it still compare favourably with the many excellent juvenile tales that have been published since its first appearance. It is reproduced in the belief that it will delight many of the young readers of to-day as it has done those of the past.
