PREFACE.

IT is with some hesitation that these Poems are sent to the Press. In this age of "The Newspaper" and "The Novel," the Muses are neither much courted nor caressed, especially the serious or sentimental Muse.

Most of the Poems in this little volume—now published in book form for the first time—have already appeared in different periodicals; and, having met with some favor, I have been induced to collect, revise, and publish them in this form, believing that they will justly receive credit for any merit that may be found in them, and, at the same time, not doubting that they will receive whatever criticism they deserve.

KESWICK, Feb. 23, 1883.

LEONORE.

WHOSE voice is that so sweet I hear,
Whose music is both sweet and clear
To please the heart and charm the ear?
The voice of her whom I adore,
Leonore.

Whose eyes are those serenely blue,
That speak a love so deep and true
No language can their depths construe?
The eyes of her whom I adore,
Leonore.
