CUR DEUS HOMO?

SAINT ANSELM'S PREFACE	xxvii
----------------------------------	-------

BOOK 3.

CHAP.
I.	The question on which the whole work depends	1
II.	How those things which are about to be asserted, are to be received	2
III.	Objections of unbelievers and answers of the faithful	5
IV.	That these answers appear superfluous to unbelievers, and like representations of the truth, not the truth itself	6
V.	That the redemption of man could not have been effected by any save by God Himself	7
VI.	How unbelievers object to our assertion that God redeemed us by His death and so showed forth His love towards us as for us to have come to conquer the devil	8
VII.	That the devil had no just right against man; and why it seems as though he had; and wherefore God should have delivered man in this way	9
VIII.	How, although the humiliations we assert Christ underwent, belong not to His divinity, they yet appear to unbelievers to be disparaging when asserted of Him as Man: and whence it seems to them that as Man He did not die of His own free will	12

CHAP.	PAGE
IX. That it was of His own free will that He died : and what is meant by "He was made obedient even unto death ;" "wherefore God highly exalted Him : " and "I came not to do Mine own will : " and " He spared not His own Son : " and " not as I will, but as Thou wilt " .	15
X. On the same points ; and how they may rightly be understood differently	19
XI. What it is to sin ; and what, to make satisfaction for sin	23
XII. Whether it beseemeth God to remit sins of His mercy alone, without any due ransom being paid	25
XIII. That in the course of things nothing is less to be tolerated than that the creature should deprive his Creator of due honour, and not repay what he has taken	27
XIV. In what way the punishment of the sinner gives honour to God.	29
XV. Whether God would suffer His honour to be profaned even in the very least	30
XVI. The reason why from among mankind must be replaced the number of angels who fell	32
XVII. That other angels could not be put in the place of those .	33
XVIII. Whether the saints will be more in number than are the lost angels	34
XIX. That mankind cannot be saved without satisfaction for sin	44
XX. That the satisfaction should be proportionate to the transgression, nor can man make it for himself	47
XXI. What is the gravity of sin	49
XXII. How man insulted God when he let himself be conquered by the devil ; for which he cannot make satisfaction . .	52
XXIII. What man, by sinning, takes away from God, which he is unable to repay	53
XXIV. That so long as man repays not to God that which he owes, he cannot be made blessed ; nor is he excused by his want of ability	54
XXV. That of necessity by Christ shall mankind be saved . .	59

vii

CHAP.	Book 33.	PAGE
I.	How man was by God created upright, that he might be blessed in the enjoyment of God,	61
II.	That man would not have died, had he not sinned	62
III.	That man will rise again with the body in which he lives here	65
IV.	That God will carry out in human nature that which He designed	63
V.	That although this be necessary, yet God doth it not of necessity; and what that necessity is which takes away or diminishes a benefit, and also what that necessity is which makes the kindness greater	64
VI.	That the satisfaction whereby man can be saved can be effected only by one who is God and Man	66
VII.	That it is necessary that some person should be perfect God and perfect man	67
VIII.	That it behoved God to assume humanity from the race of Adam and from a woman, a virgin	68
IX.	That the word alone, and humanity, should be united in one person, is imperative	71
X.	That this same man would not lie under the necessity of death; and how it would be that he could, or could not, sin; also, why he, or an angel, are to be praised for their righteousness, whereas they cannot sin	73
XI.	That he would die of his own free will; and that mortality does not belong to pure human nature	77
XII.	That although he would be partaker of our infirmities, yet would he not be wretched	80
XIII.	That he would not, with our other infirmities, partake of our ignorance	81
XIV.	How his death could exceed in value the many and great sins of mankind	82
XV.	How that death can also atone for the sins of those who slew Him	84
XVI.	How from the sinful mass God assumed sinless humanity; and of the salvation of Adam and Eve	86

CHAP.	PAGE
XVII. How it is that He died without necessity, who could not have been except He was to die	90
XVIII. (a.) That for God there is neither necessity nor impossibility; also, what is compulsory, and what non-compulsory, necessity	94
XVIII. (b.) How the life of Christ atoned to God for the sins of men, and how it behoved Christ to suffer, and how it did not behove Him to suffer	100
XIX. The reasoning whereby from His death may be deduced the salvation of man	104
XX. How great, and how just, is the mercy of God	107
XXI. That is impossible that the devil should be saved	108
XXII. That by what has been said is proved the truth of the Old and of the New Testaments	109
