PREFACE.

As this little work is put forward in connection with two others (a Manual of Grammar and a Manual of Logic), I may fairly claim that it shall be estimated with a reference to the whole course of instruction, of which it is but a part.

A much larger province is asserted in it for Rhetoric than is usually assumed-larger, for instance, than Dr. Whately claims for it in his Elements of Rhetoric. My assumption is not arbitrary; but even if it were so, I might justify it by saying with Dr. Whately, that " it is an error to suppose a general term has some real object properly corresponding to it, independent of our conceptions; that consequently, some one definition is to be found which will comprehend everything that is rightly designated by that term, and that all others must be erroneous." I do not wish, however, to rest on this excuse; I prefer saying, that having assigned to Grammar, Logic, and Rhetoric, all instruction for the full use of language to its appropriate ends, and having given to the first two what I thought strictly belonged to them, I was obliged to give to Rhetoric all that remained. The portion is so extensive, that any one, taking up this very little book, may naturally ask, how, with such a wide space before me, I can pretend to answer by it what that large tract requires. But I make no such pretence. I consider that instruction in Rhetoric is already provided for by polite literature at large, with which Rhetoric is co-extensive; and as to this little work, it professes, with reference to the extensive country on which the traveller enters, to be nothing more than what it is called—A hand-book.

MANUAL OF RHETORIC.

INTRODUCTION.

1. RHETORIC, according to the etymology of the word,[•] is the art of speaking. But speaking in our early practice when learned without theory, and in our later practice when exercised under the light of theory, is the union of three arts, namely, of Grammar, Logic, and Rhetoric.

These are separate during the progress of learning, and only then, in order that the progress may be unimpeded and secure. And since, in this theoretical separation, a distinct province is to be assigned to each of the three; since, as we have seen, grammar looks no further than to correctness of construction, and logic no further than to the sense which words embody singly, or develop by union,—to rhetoric must belong all that remains for rendering language a perfect instrument, fitted to convince, persuade, and delight, †

2. To distinguish Rhetoric from Logic, we may state, as an especial characteristic of the former, that though, with Logic, it may appeal to the understanding, yet it never rests in this appeal as an end, but hastens on, in order to reach the heart, and, thence, if deemed necessary at the time, to move the will.[‡] It concerns itself with our emotions; with which part of our nature, Logic is forbidden to interfere.

The distinctness of Rhetoric from Logic is rendered complete, by admitting what in the Manual of Logic is to be laid down as a principle, namely, that in logic we are supposed to use language only as an instrument to accumulate our own knowledge, and then to develop it for our own security and satisfaction. This indeed is a preparation, and the proper preparation, for using the same instrument effectually when we propose to instruct, and convince, and

^{*} From Hew (rheo), I speak.

⁺ The end of Poetry is to delight,---of Oratory, to persuade. Our view of Rhetoric includes both Poetry and Oratory, though the word is in general so limited as to include only the latter.

[‡] Poetry requires only the former—Oratory, in almost all its kinds, demands the latter also.
