SIR THOMAS HOPE, the progenitor and founder of the family of that name in all its Scottish branches, was a person of too great celebrity and distinction in his own age, to make it necessary, in this place, to give any account of his life or character, either as a lawyer or a statesman. The following pages, to which the title of a "Diary" has been affixed, may perhaps be supposed to exhibit but a slender claim to public notice. The greater part of the volume is occupied with little more than minute chronological memoranda of his official, as well as private correspondence, during the last twelve years of his life, when he held a very important place in the service of the State, as Lord Advocate of Scotland; but it derives a considerable degree of interest and value from the numerous allusions incidentally introduced to the passing occurrences of the day, during a very critical period of our national history; and still more, perhaps, from the scattered lights that are thrown on the personal character of one of the most remarkable men of his own age, as well as on the political characters and connexions of some of his distinguished contem-
