The first part of the history of England is divided into three periods. The first period is the period of the Anglo-Saxons, the second period is the period of the Normans, and the third period is the period of the Plantagenets. The Anglo-Saxons were the first to settle in England, and they were followed by the Normans. The Normans were the first to introduce feudalism into England, and they were followed by the Plantagenets. The Plantagenets were the first to introduce the concept of a monarch who is elected by the people, and they were followed by the Tudors. The Tudors were the first to introduce the concept of a monarch who is elected by the people, and they were followed by the Stuarts. The Stuarts were the first to introduce the concept of a monarch who is elected by the people, and they were followed by the Hanoverians. The Hanoverians were the first to introduce the concept of a monarch who is elected by the people, and they were followed by the Georgians. The Georgians were the first to introduce the concept of a monarch who is elected by the people, and they were followed by the Victorians. The Victorians were the first to introduce the concept of a monarch who is elected by the people, and they were followed by the Edwardians. The Edwardians were the first to introduce the concept of a monarch who is elected by the people, and they were followed by the Windsors. The Windsors were the first to introduce the concept of a monarch who is elected by the people, and they were followed by the current monarch, King Charles III.
