PREFATORY NOTE

These sermons were written and delivered as Baccalaureate addresses. The first two were spoken to men alone; the third was spoken to women alone; the others were spoken to both men and women. All of them are endeavors to interpret the relations of education and religion, with the purpose of making education more nobly religious, religion more wise, and both more liberal.

The order of the arrangement of the addresses is chronological, the first having been given in 1891, and the last in June of the present year.

A LIBERAL EDUCATION AND A LIBERAL FAITH

I

THE HIGHER EDUCATION AND THE DIVINE KINGDOM.

"And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians."—Acts vii. 22.

MOSES was the servant of God. He was also the pupil of the Egyptian teachers. He set forth the Ten Commandments, but he knew the laws of men. Moses was in Egypt in order to leave Egypt. He did not fear that pagan learning would unfit him to emancipate a holy people. He may have believed that pagan learning would help him to emancipate a holy people. It is not rash to infer that the education of Moses did aid him in the deliverance and the progress of the nation of Israel. The text, therefore, suggests my subject: "The Higher Education Promotes the Progress of God's Kingdom."
