PREFACE

the faith of the evangelical church. His experience at the university led him to a decision that his life should be given to positive and constructive teaching. He is glad to have found splendid liberty and unlimited opportunity among the Christians who exalt Jesus the Christ as the incomparable revelation of the character and purpose of God.

If the theories and the convictions of this book prove of profit to any, it will be because they have been shaped on the anvil of experience. The author has resisted the temptation to cite other authors, either for favorable or adverse criticism.

The book is published with the hope that it may help men unaccustomed to speculative thinking, to some clear ideas of the fundamental things of religion. It is therefore written in the language of the street and of the shop, rather than in the language of the schools. The author has even hoped that the book might reach the minds of some of the multitude of the unchurched,
