INTRODUCTION.

To a sportsman, dry details of facts tending to his instruction in a favourite pursuit are usually acceptable; and this being the case, the conveying of that instruction, by introducing on to the scene persons and things partly the creation of the Author's inventive powers, may appear an anomaly, as sporting subjects are not usually looked upon as pills requiring much gilding.

Writing this little book has been a source of very great amusement to the Author. The events narrated have, in most of the cases, happened within his own knowledge. The keepers and poachers are, generally, portraits. In the case of the latter class a recognition by the individual himself followed the appearance of his name (of course disguised) in the article in the Field, where it was introduced. With these few preliminary words the Author confides his unpretending exertions to the notice of an indulgent public.

May, 1868.
