CONTENTS.

LETTER I.

Error in principle, and error in practice. Predestination a revealed truth. Reason should submit to revelation. Truths above reason which depend on revelation alone. Plan of discussion in these Letters. Fixed state of all events from eternity, supposing no decree of God concerning them. Considerations showing the probability that God has decreed them. Absolute impossibility of God's not having decreed them. Proof on the first point: Causes and effects, and their mutual dependence. All events one continued series of causes and effects. Illustrations. The proposition, though strange to some, yet true. No such thing as chance, accident, or contingency. The foretelling of events by astronomers. How every event might be fully traced. Our ignorance of causes does not make them contingent. Eclipses and the wild African. Conclusion in favor of the proposition. Objection that things often occur to throw effects out of their natural channel, of no weight. The unprejudiced left without doubt.

LETTER II.

6-11-32 6-11-32
Fixedness of events from their futurity and the knowledge God has about them. All things that ever did or will take place future from eternity, a self evident truth. Future events as certain as past events. Non-existence destroys futurity. Futurity ascertains existence. — God omniscient, otherwise, not God. God's knowledge of future things proves their existence at the time known. State of the argument. Summary reflexive view. Must be a first cause, but that can be only God. How the reader must examine these things. Word of God our rule.

LETTER III.

The principles laid down not stoicism. Matter neither deified nor made eternal. God the only Ruler and Guide. Second proposition;

Probability of God's choosing and fixing all things from eternity. Supernatural and extraordinary events. The deluge. Building of Babel, Destruction of Sodom, Fall of Abraham, Judgments on Egypt, Exodus of Israel, and their settlement in Canaan. State of the Jews to the present time. Daily experience in reference to the elements and all created instruments. Thunder and lightning. Winds and storm. Inundations. Pestilence. Wars. Earthquakes. — Prophecies — as, concerning Christ, his church, the nations of the world. Prophecies not a mere foretelling of events by tracing effects from their causes, but positive, informing what should take place — what God would bring to pass.

LETTER IV.

Probability of God's choosing and fixing all things, from their dependence on God. Nothing created independent. Existence to-day no foundation of the same to-morrow. God unceasingly sustains all. His power always exerted. He alone independent. His will to exert his power. Cannot be supposed to exert his power contrary to his will. — Probability from the analogy of human and divine power. Understanding, or power of perception and judgment. Will, or power of preferring and choosing. Right of direction in the understanding. Bias of love, hatred, &c. The choice made will be executed. The will always chooses the greatest apparent good, or what is most agreeable. Every one will do what he chooses, if he can. Every one judges and chooses. Must from the nature and powers of the soul. So in God more especially. His idea of all things perfect. So his judgment. So his will.

LETTER V.

Third proposition: Impossibility of God's not having fixed, from eternity, whatsoever comes to pass. Topics of argument. The perfections of God, and his works. Perfections of God, what. Not of the nature of accidents, adjuncts, or qualities of a subject, but as the subject itself. Not as subsisting separately. Ground on which opposers deny the doctrine. Appeal to opposers. — Eternity as a perfection of God, — not to be judged of by our ideas of time. Neither before nor after with God, as eternal — Omnipresence. Eternity and omnipresence include each other. The 8th of Proverbs and the 139th Psalm. — Consequences upon the admission of these two attributes. All possible existences present to God's understanding, and subject to his will. All uncertainty as to the nature, properties causes and consequences of things, excluded. God's will never in suspense. Consequence if it could be. God's will his essence. Admits of no succession. A case supposed showing how every thing must be eternal in the mind of God. Succession belongs only to creatures. All things unalterably fixed by the divine will, as the effect of positive power or of sovereign permission. The determinations of an infinite mind not suspended.

LETTER VI.

God incomprehensible, and man vain. Invocation of the Spirit. Recapitulation and state of the argument. Further investigation. God only can originate. Subsequent existence and operations all depend on Him. Their existence must have been determined by Him. Consequently all according to his eternal purpose and determinate counsel. Otherwise, new acts of will in God. Absurdities and contradictions, if so. Destruction of God's eternity. Destruction of his omnipresence. Any new act of will in God impossible. Another consequence, an effect without a cause.

LETTER VII.

What the author once thought. His change and present state. Argument from two more attributes, omniscience and immutability. These attributes, what. What follows their admission. All things the objects of God's decrees because of his knowledge. Whether He knows them, because He has decreed them. Knowledge, on what founded in God, on what in man. Illustrations as to the latter, from the operations of nature. Creatures themselves not the foundation of their knowledge, much less of God's. All resolvable into his eternal and immutable will. Confirmation of this view from the circumstance that while God might have prevented things being as they are, He has permitted them.

LETTER VIII.

Recapitulation. Object in the Letter. Attributes of eternity and immutability essentially connected. Immutability and predestination stand or fall together. Immutability in God, what. Predestination, what. The two synonymous. Consequence. Further proof. Absurd consequences of denying God's fore-knowledge to be founded on his will, or that his will and purposes are eternal. If founded on the will of another, that other must be God; if on things material and inanimate they must have operated on the divine mind before they existed. Dilemma. State of the case if so. Consequences. Answer to the objection, that though God's knowledge of things be founded on his will, yet it does not follow that his will is eternal.

LETTER IX.

How far the argument has been advanced. Further purpose in this Letter. Omnipotence and wisdom. Omnipotence, what. Essential to Deity. Appears in all his works. All power in creatures, source of it in God. He the Power by which all things exist. Wisdom, what. Also essential to Deity. Evinc'd by creation, providence and grace. Depth of wisdom in grace. Appeal to the friend addressed in the Letters. Additional proofs from propositions assumed as axioms. God willing to act before He acts. Forming a plan of all his works, before He exerted himself to produce them. His works such as might be expected from perfect wisdom. Any thing other not the will and pleasure of God. The plan and the ends aimed at in it. These no other than his glory. Comprehension of the plan as taking in the whole compass of finite being with everything any way concerned. Conclusion.

LETTER X.

State of the argument. What is further proposed. Plan. Nature and operation of power and wisdom in rational and intelligent beings. Power, what. All acts, exertions of power. Power seated in the will. Case where there is constraint, not applicable to God. Wisdom, what. Three senses in which it is understood. How human beings discover where it resides. Wisdom defined. Wisdom and power, how they operate. Remarks. How the case is with God.

LETTER XI.

Conclusions and arguments from premises established. From power. Power centred in the will. Is so in God. Nothing in all creation but is a display of power. Power not in or from matter. That wholly passive. Nor from created spirits. Every act of mind an effect of prior agency. Neither its own cause. The soul passive in all acts considered as effects. Illustration. Conclusion. Relation of cause and effect universal. Summary in regard to power. General conclusion.

LETTER XII.

Subject of the Letter. Axioms. No principle of operation can act contrary to its nature. Therefore wisdom cannot. Consequently folly springs from another principle. Perfect wisdom not in entire possession where is the least possible error. Therefore found only in God. Whether God permits anything not determined. Inferences. All wisdom in God's understanding. Also indubitable certainty. The best not only known but chosen. Consequence if not. His wisdom prevents the possibility of a new volition. Consequence, that He does what he chooses. At no loss for means. Summary in regard to wisdom.

LETTER XIII.

What must appear from things laid down in Letter XII. Subject. How the case must be on supposition any event exists without, or
