PREFACE.

I would not apologize for my work, but simply use that right which all authors have, of starting the reader with correct notions of the spirit and intention of the writer.

Firstly, being a firm believer in the grand old doctrines of Christianity, I would disclaim any intention of ridiculing religion, but rather those who make of it a farce.

Secondly, my desire is merely to present a vexing problem in the simplest manner possible; therefore, I have not burdened these pages with statistics, which are always misleading; nor have I dressed the problem in its holiday attire, ready for an airing in the presence of Senators and men of legal lore; but have left it in its every-day dress, for those who wear such garments to examine it.
